HISTORY OF THE RED BULL RING

FIVE DECADES FULL OF MOTORSPORT

At the Red Bull Ring, one can breathe decades of motor racing history that have left their mark on the race track. Spectacular Formula 1 races took place there from 1963 to 2003, initially on the airfield at Zeltweg, and later on the current grounds of the Red Bull Ring. Jochen Rindt and Niki Lauda, Alain Prost and Michael Schumacher – they all lapped the legendary circuit over the years. Now, the Red Bull Ring is about to take Spielberg to a new era of motor racing. History started to be made there again in May 2011.

The race held in 1963 on the military airstrip at Zeltweg was given the title 'First Grand Prix of Austria', but did not yet have world championship status. In the 1960s, Formula 1 was still a relatively low-budget affair so, after the convivial experience in the Styrian region, a lot of love and persuasion was used to pull off a F1 World Championship race there in 1964. The cost of getting a car onto the starting grid back then was the equivalent of around € 100,000 now, a fee which has since multiplied by around three hundred. The race was not bad – aside from the exit of top stars like Jim Clark, Graham Hill, Dan Gurney and John Surtees. Their more delicate vehicles fell victim to the surface of the airstrip, and for such a bumpy track there could be no future in Formula 1. So that was that. There were proud memories, but then, with the emergence of Jochen Rindt, motor racing acquired a new status in Austria; and at the same time, politicians were trying to find ways of promoting a structurally weak region.

"This track offers a fantastic symbiosis of architecture and landscape. I know of no other course anywhere in the world which is set so magnificently within an attractive area. The new tracks tend to be sterile and derive their impact from monumental structures which have nothing to do with racing as such. Here, the ups and downs amid the landscape offer something more personal in nature. To me, it is as if the track has some kind of connection with its whole surroundings."

Dr. Helmut Marko, winner of the very first race (1969) at the Österreichring on a Chevrolet Camaro. It was the first support race of the opening event. Marko also won the second heat (Formula V), and we find a 20-year-old Niki Lauda in eighth position on that race's list.

That is how the Österreichring came to be built not far from the Zeltweg airfield, in the municipality of Spielberg. It was opened in 1969, and 1970 saw its first Formula 1 World Championship race, while the sport was still within reasonable financial bounds. What was really exciting about that period was the contest to build Europe's fastest racetrack, faster than the Hockenheimring (which still had its long forest sections) and Spa-Francorchamps. A backdrop of a hundred thousand spectators was also quite remarkable, but what was even more exciting was, of course, the fact that world championship-leading Austrian Jochen Rindt entered the race, although he had to drop out because of a defect. It was his last world championship race; Jochen Rindt died three weeks later during a practice session for the Grand Prix at Monza. No one could have imagined it at the time but Rindt was actually to be followed by some sort of successor and new heroes tackled the Ring which was, despite being one of the fastest, also one of the safest race tracks of its age. But it took much of his career for Niki Lauda to actually win a world championship race there, having made his debut at the Österreichring 15 years earlier; an Austrian victory finally came in 1984 and was crucial for his third world championship title.

"I think it's brilliant that Austria once again has a world-class race track alongside everything else that is so special about the region – it's nothing short of a tradition now. To me, the first hanging left-hand corner in the twisty downhill section is one of the most challenging bends in the entire calendar. It used to be called the Lauda Corner. Not a bad name, don't you think?"

Niki Lauda (1949-2019) came eighth in the Formula V race on the Österreichring's opening day in 1969, and in 1984 became the first and only Austrian to win an Austrian Grand Prix, for McLaren-TAG-Turbo.

The Ring was much more than just a Formula 1 showplace. Countless races involving touring cars and lower racing formulas provided young talents with early opportunities. The 19-year-old Gerhard Berger raced around a track for the very first time there (in a 1600 cc Escort), and over the years that followed earned himself a kind of local citizenship. "Just thinking about arriving there with the Alfasud behind me on the trailer makes my heart beat faster. I felt at home there, and I used to really let rip, whether in the Alfasud or in Formula Ford." A milestone in the new Formula 1 era was the extraordinary average speed of 248 km/h achieved by Nelson Piquet in a practice lap in 1984 aboard a Brabham with the famous BMW turbo engine. Gerhard Berger arrived at Formula 1 just in time to experience the high-point of the turbo craze. His Benetton-BMW is reputed to have put out 1,300 horsepower in practice in 1986. It had almost too much power for its own good.

"The turbo years were the wildest time in Formula 1. And the Ring was tailor-made for a gut-feeling driver like me, and simply the best racing track in the world – ideal for my senses, so that I could experience and push the limit. When it came to corner-sequence, extreme speed and undulations, no other track could offer such an exciting mix – it was motor racing in its purest form."

Gerhard Berger participated in his very first race on the Österreichring (1978, Ford Escort), and dropped out in the lead at the F1 race in 1986 (at the high-point of the turbo era, in a Benetton-BMW with more than 1,000 horsepower).

As the turbo era was superseded by a new engine formula, the politics of Formula 1 marketing also changed; things became more aggressive, people wanted to see more money, and special arrangements were sought in state and regional politics. Amid those circumstances, two truly messy and dramatic pile-ups in the first lap of the 1987 Grand Prix provided a good excuse to rearrange the Formula 1 calendar and cross Austria off the list. When a fresh start was made after a ten year hiatus, both sides had gone to some lengths to accommodate each other, but the undisputed benefit was the existence of a 'safe', 'modern' track which, while continuing to make use of the geography of the Aichfeld area and the track's situation in a river basin, now satisfied the sport's new sense of proportion, and even set new trends in it. Of course, losing the long top-speed straight in the west was a shame but the new, shorter version of the track made up for this loss by accentuating the site's arena-like effect. There were seven Grand Prix races from that point onwards, some of which were fabulous, some of which patchy (team orders), until gradually, the underlying conditions behind the broader global Formula 1 vision changed, as did the political environment in Austria itself.

The last Formula 1 race in 2003 was followed by a period of uncertainty as to the future of the Ring. But after protracted planning, which was much scrutinised in its environmental aspects, the Red Bull Ring entered operation in May 2011.

RED BULL RING – CIRCUIT DETAILS

The new Red Bull Ring complies with all current international safety standards. This means that every type of racing permitted under FIA (four-wheel) rules can be held there. Its length is 4.3 kilometers, and its routing is the same as that used from 1996 to 2003 on the layout designed by the world's most famous Grand Prix track architect Hermann Tilke.

Part of what makes this race track attractive is the sloping terrain around it which creates a natural arena. Natural areas help solving the discrepancy between safety and the closeness of the spectators to the action in the best possible way. In the best spots, one practically sits above the race cars and can spot the drivers in their cockpits as they break, tackle accelerate out of the corners which gives one the feeling of being part of the action; at most other tracks you are so far away you have to use binoculars. Certain places allow views of two thirds of the track, and it is not unusual to witness the now-rare spectacle of cars powersliding; the road surface lends itself to powersliding more than newly designed tracks. Since 2011, the Ring has welcomed many major top-class racing series such as the MotoGP and hosted many exciting races in various classes. The aim is to offer a balanced season programme with a mix of race events, presentations, testing and public activities.
